Air support is like health insurance. You don't need it until you need it, and then when you need it you need it now.

Um... did this just randomly occur to you? Dare I ask for context?

I wish I could call for troops armed with clue bats.

I* wish I could call for troops armed with clue bats.*

Calling for them is easy. Getting them to actually show up is the tricky part.

(Especially when you add the clue bats to the mix. I'm pretty sure nobody's found a reliable vendor for those yet.)

I don't want to know the circumstances under which this thought occurred to you, I really don't. You're right, of course. But I still don't think I want the details.

They're not sharable anyway. ;-)

Not sharable the way that those romance novel titles aren't sharable? Or not sharable in the "I could tell you, but then I'd have to kill you" sort of way?

(either way, here's to hoping that your air support does a better job than most US health insurance plans)

I suppose this means you are not actually in Canada right now.

(Because otherwise, that really rad tourist in Halifax....)

Which explains why so many US Navy ships have their own helicopters, and why US Marine Corps expeditionary units have organic air combat elements.

That sounds ominous: Here's wishing you flights of choppers whenever you need them.

And it never quite covers everything you want/need it to. But some is better than none, to be sure.

Air support is one of those things you totally want to be able to say later 'And we had X but didn't end up needing it'.

So sayeth the Air Force brat.

This is why the RAAF likes people to schedule their crises in advance.

You can see the problem with that system, though...

Spooky, don't leave home without one. evil grin

However, feel free to leave home those that would deny air support to the boots on the ground.
